After going through the resources and trying out a few of the exercises, I definitely feel more confident in my understanding of CSS and how it defines styles in HTML. At the same time, I feel a little overwhelmed by how much possibility there is in CSS because I feel like there's so much to learn and use. Most of the resources we were assigned to review I understood perfectly but I still feel a little confused in some aspects of the sub navigation menu and dropdown menu because of some parts of the code that are unfamiliar to me. Going through the exercises was actually fun for me especially because it wasn't too difficult. However, there were a few times where I had no clue and had to get a hint or look at the answer to understand but I usually tried to look though the CSS examples before to see if I can figure it out. I really appreciate the offers of W3schools and will definitely have to use it to help me create my own website. Overall, the more I learn the more excited/eager I am to understand/learn more even though I know it's going to take a lot of time.
